

John,

So I do not disrupt your work I will write my feelings for you in this moment so that I may express my emotions accurately. I feel extremely hurt. You have seen how much I care about this trip as I have taken care of every painstaking detail, minus the hotel. I gave you a small list of tasks for you, even going as far as to write them down for you, so that this trip could go a little more smoothly, but you failed to do so. I understand you made a mistake, and that is not what I am upset and hurt by, but rather how you handled it. As the saying goes if there is a way there is a way. I know you did your best looking for the keys, but once you decided they were a lost cause instead of finding a way to contact me at work in one of the following:

- getting a charger from a neighbor
- asking a neighbor for a phone to look up my work ~~##~~
- walking to my work
- etc.

You decided it was best to just sit and wait. I understand this trip is not important to you, but it is to me and therefore it should be somewhat important to you. This made me feel unimportant. Even if the trip isn't important to you, I know your work is. As you mentioned having a deadline I would imagine if it was really that important you would find a way to get inside to get it done on the off chance I came home late. It makes me wonder if you treat time, mine, yours and others as unimportant and makes me concerned as time and being → on time is extremely important to me. ~~and I~~ ~~have to say it~~ I can only have blind faith for so long.